Why in News?

A Study published in the journal Nature identifies the Caucasus Lower Volga people as the probable originators of Indo-European languages, challenging the earlier Yamnaya theory.

What are the Key Findings of the Study?

- Genetic Origin: The Caucasus Lower Volga people, who lived 6,500 years ago on the Eurasian steppe, stretching from the Volga River to the Caucasus Mountains, are identified as the genetic progenitors of the Indo-European language family.
- Yamnaya People's Role: The Yamnaya people (5,700-5,300 years ago), descendants of the Caucasus Lower Volga, played a significant role in spreading Proto-Indo-European languages across Europe, the Indian subcontinent, and China.
 - These ancient populations migrated west, mixed with locals, and formed the distinct Yamnaya genome.
 - Earlier researches suggested the ancient Yamnaya people of the steppe as the originators of Proto-Indo-European, the precursor to modern Indo-European languages.
- Economic Transformation: The Yamnaya people's new economic practices, such as livestock herding and the use of oxen-drawn wagons, enabled their migration and expansion.
 - The Yamnaya underwent a demographic explosion, expanding from a few thousand people to tens of thousands within a few centuries.
